

FACES OF THE FRONT

Ed and Carole Kaminski Residents, Velocity Condos

The Possibilities are Infinite

After living near Annapolis for the last decade, Carol and Ed Kaminski are ready for a change. Their suburban home with its good schools and plenty of room, suited them well as their children were growing up. But these self-described foodies – who love going to new restaurants, theater and museums – always found suburban life a little sterile.

With their children now in college, they decided to make a move to the District, and after an extensive search from Upper Northwest to Dupont Circle, discovered the Capitol Riverfront and Velocity condos.

“Here everything available to you, just a subway ride away. The possibilities are infinite. I fell in love with the vision.” Ed says.

Many of their friends and neighbors don’t understand their decision. Some would even consider them pioneers. But the Kaminskis believe there is nothing pioneering about moving to the Capitol Riverfront, and point to the appeal of being part of a new community on the river where people can live, work and play.

And while the retail and offices have yet to be built out, they are excited about what already exists in the neighborhood. “With the economy as it is, I had to ask myself, if nothing else got built for a while would I be o.k. here, and the answer is yes,” Carole says. “The opportunity to do things is right at our doorstep.”
